Hogarth's Masterpiece

We remember, years ago, of having heard the following anecdote of Hogarth, and we doem that it will bear repeating. The celebrated artist was once applied to by an exceedingly wealthy, but very penartous old nobleman, to paint the main hall of a new mansion with a historical piece -a style of embellishment much in vogue among the aristocracy of the period. Hogarth was open to the proposition, and was asked what he would charge to paint upon the walls of the hall a representation of the Passage of the Children of Israel across the Red Sea, pursued by Pharaoh and his host. The painter viewed the hall, and replied that he would do it for one hundred guineas. The miserly old nabob turned up his nose in amazement at the enormous charge. He would give twenty guineas for the work; and that was more than he deemed it worth. Hogarth, as may well be supposed was both vexed and mortified by this but he nodded, and held back his temper, and finally said, if the sum were paid to him in advance, he rangement, and he could not repress a chuckle of inward satisfaction in view of his grand bargain as he paid the merrow

Bright and early on the following morning the artist appeared at the mansion, accompained by a stout assistant who bore a huge bucket of common red paint, and at once they proceeded to danh the walls of the

An hour before noon, just as the nobleman was getting up from his bed, Hogarth knocked at his door, announcing, when the host appeared. "Well, sir, the work is done." "Done !" cried the astonished aristoerat. "What is done?"

"Why, the painting of your ball, Unable what to make of this marvellous expedition, the old knight threw on his dressing-gown and went down to view the result of the artist's labors, and his consternation can be better imagined than described upon beholding the unbroken and unrelieved brick-red bue that covered walls and cornice and wainscot.

"What, in the name of wonder, is this?" he cried, rubbing his eyes, and gazing from the daub to the dauber. "That, sir," replied Hogarth, with a low bow, and with a serious look, Ta the Red Sea !! : The Red Sea! But-but-where
